

Assignment 4 – Processing Fixed Length Record Data with Threads

Description:

This assignment was built on what we have learned in this class, as well as other courses to come up with a solution that parses a header file, use that information as a key to then parse data read in from a different file of fixed length. This data is then analyzed and stored in a global data structure and then printed to screen in a formatted structure. The goal was to introduce coding decisions that would pay off when introducing multiple threads, while eliminating race conditions by using mutex locks on critical data portions.

The data we were analyzing was real call log data from SFPD, and we got to choose 2 neighborhoods or police districts as well as the total city to create statistics on. There were 3 main metrics. Dispatch vs received time, onscene vs enroute time and onscene vs received time. Of those 3 main categories, basic statistics were applied to find values such as mean, median, standard deviation, upper and lower bounds and more. To do all of this, I created a separate header and implementation file that hold structs and helper functions to try and keep the main() as decluttered as possible. I will discuss this more in the approach section.

Approach:

As with the other assignments, I broke this down into 4 steps to make it a bit more manageable. I started just trying to see what was in the header file. Then I did the same with .dat file. Then I had to evaluate how I was going to process these files cohesively and then analyze the data that was read in to finally print the desired table to statistics. Then after a few different runs with different thread numbers and the different .dat file sizes, I had to circle back and make some revisions to address execution time as well as improvement of the multi-threaded solutions. To start, I initialize my globalStatArray and initialize pertinent fields with their associated arguments through argv[]. Then we move onto step 1.

Step 1.) Reading the Header file

To do this, I created a helper function readHeader of type recordData which is a struct that holds important information contained in the header file. We then get some information about this file using stat() (<https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man2/stat.2.html>), in this case we just wanted to know the size of the file. We then open the header file using open() (<https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man2/open.2.html>) with the flag O_RDONLY. We then create a buffer of that size + 1 read from the file into the buffer, closing the file at completion. We then iterate through the buffer, count the number of lines searching for \n. This is used to create a dynamic array of recordData structs. Then we split the line using strchr (<https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man3/strchr.3.html>) and terminate with null. This splits each line to field width on the left and field name on the right. In the while loop, we cycle through the headerline, populating each struct with their pertinent information. We use atoi()

(<https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man3/atoi.3.html>) to convert string representing the fieldWidth to the actual integer value. After exiting the loop, each struct has the totalRecordLength defined, and the allocated memory for the buffer is freed, pointing that pointer to null to get rid of the dangling pointer. Now that we have the “map” to process the .dat file, that is exactly what we do.

Step 2.) Reading the Data file

Now we move on to the .dat file, which we open with the same O_RDONLY flag. We gather some similar stats and determine the total amount of records by taking the file size and dividing it by the record length. We then initialize the globalStatArray and call pthread_mutex_init() (https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man3/pthread_mutex_init.3p.html) to create separate locks for our total city aggStats struct, and two other police district/neighborhood structs. Here we use a helper function initTimeData to ensure all stats/counters start at 0. We also initialize the hash tables to NULL and set the category name for our 3 aggStats structs from their respective command line arguments. We are now ready to move onto the processing portion, which is step 3.

Step 3.) Processing and Printing Data

We starts by creating numThreads which is determined by the command line argument. We loop through however many threads are created and make a call to a helper function called processRecordChunk() feeding in the thread and their associated data using pthread_create (https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man3/pthread_create.3.html). Diving into that helper, we create a buffer and then loop through the records that are passed in. We are utilizing pread() (<https://man7.org/linux/man-pages/man2/pread.2.html>) to read in a single record into the buffer, which we then pass onto parseAggRecord(). This function is a core driver of the program, as it looks at each record, converts the datetime string using convertDateTime, and trims some whitespace from certain fields. It also very importantly does data validation by checking to see if the time difference is positive and determining which call descriptor to use. If the data makes it past these validations, it is passed to our clarifyCallTypeH() function. This helper uses a shared hash table that is protected by mutex's to ensure the critical section is safe from race conditions. It uses a hash table for its speed, since this is potential traffic jam for the multi-thread scenarios, to find the right call type. It either finds the existing callType struct or creates a new one. Once the callType is found, addTimeToData() is called to add the new time difference and count to the respective timeData struct. This area is also surrounded by mutex's for safe operations.

We then wait for all the threads to finish and call the analyzePrintResults() helper function. This function calls calcStats(), which uses and insertionSort() function to sort the time array. It then calculates all the other requested statistics. Finally, it loops through the different globalStatArray indexs and calls our print function printStats() to display the requested table.

Step 4.) Revising for multi-threading

Once I had this working, I tested out many different runs with different file sizes and thread counts. I wasn't seeing the time benefits of multithreading, which meant there was a roadblock somewhere. The more threads I added, the slower it got. I will mention, it was only a bit slower in the seconds, but still, it would be faster if everything was built properly.

One of the first things I did was move from the linear search to a hash table in the clarifyCallTypeH() function. My thought process was the linear search was holding the mutex in the lock position, and this holding period grew as we moved to larger file sizes. Moving to a has algorithm made a big difference in overall execution time but only moved the needle slightly in the multi-threading scenarios. I also increased the initial capacity of the times array within the initTimeData() function. The size was skewed for our 500k file and made it so that if more capacity was needed, it wouldn't need to reallocate so many times, holding things up. After these changes, the execution time for the multi-threading scenarios did become faster than their single threaded counterpart. While it is only saving tens of seconds, it still shows improvement.

Issues and Resolutions:

Once everything was built out, one of the first issues I had was that some of the time stats were negative. This was a result of bad data. When I was first building this out, I tested first reading out the header to see what the contents looked like, and then once I had that "map," I printed out the first 5-20 lines from the smallest .dat file. What this showed me was that many fields in different lines just weren't populated. And some of them were only partially filled with content we needed to get the statistical results we wanted. To alleviate this issue, we added some data validation. First I made sure the time conversions weren't faulty, and then I checked to ensure the difference between those 3 main time statistics weren't negative. In order to be added, the difference had to be ≥ 0 .

Another issue I had was during one of my refactoring, when I was implementing the hash table the program would crash/segfault. The issue ended up being in my has function, where if forgot to add "unsigned" in front of my int hashVal.

Analysis:

For my analysis, I chose to look at the Richmond and Taraval police districts. I chose these two because they are close to where I live, and I thought it would be insightful to look at the statistics. One common thread amongst these two districts and the entire city, was response times were very fast when the situation was critical. For instance, citywide, the mean dispatch to receive time for a shooting was 144 seconds or roughly 3 minutes. In the Taraval district, the same stat was about 119 seconds or roughly 2 minutes, and for the Richmond district it was 1019 seconds or roughly 17 minutes. That last stat is very slow compared to the two others, but the median time is about 120 seconds, in line with the others. In comparison, a non-critical event, such as stolen property, took exponentially longer than critical calls. This makes sense with limited manpower; they actively triage responses based on criticality.

Runtimes for the 500k .dat file:

1 thread	2 thread	4 thread	8 thread
230.047777646	211.632357668	206.38403084	210.06346557

Here are the runtimes for the 500k .dat file. Initially, my single thread solution was the fastest which pointed to some bottlenecks in the program. As I mentioned earlier slow algorithm implementation caused the multi-threaded solutions to queue up behind the mutex locks, which made them longer to execute. After the revisions I discussed, we can see that the single thread solution is now the slowest, followed by the 2-threaded solution, then the 8-threaded solution, leaving the 4-threaded solution the fastest. This could mean that in my program's current form, the 4-threaded solution is the peak scaling performance, that begins to diminish after adding more threads. This happens because there are still parts of the program that cause this bottleneck.
